

UTAH'S Black Hawk WAR

John Alton Peterson

Sally Young Kanosh, pictured here in 1878, was the stepdaughter of Brigham Young and wife of Chief Kanosh.

Chief Kanosh (1821–1884) was the leader of the Pahvant Utes from the 1850s until his death.

Black Hawk, a Ute Leader, led his tribe against the settlers in the longest and most destructive conflict in Utah history.

for it. After the Northern Ute chiefs had signed the treaty, Irish sent it to Washington where it languished in Congress until 1869 when the Senate finally rejected it. Anticipating the ratification of the treaty, Irish began to move the Utes to the Uinta Basin during the winter of 1865–66. In Utah's Trail of Tears, the Northern Utes suffered unimaginable hardship and unnumbered deaths from exposure and starvation.

In the meantime, a band of Sanpitch Utes under the leadership of Black Hawk (Autenquer), a subchief, had recognized the futility of such negotiations and began to raid Mormon settlements for horses and cattle. When they failed to get the rations promised in the Spanish Fork Treaty, warriors from San Pitch's and Tabby's bands began to leave the Uintah Reservation to join in what Utahns called the Black Hawk War. Moreover, in spite of the traditional animosity between the various tribes, Paiutes and Navajos joined with the Northern Utes to steal livestock from Mormon settle-for it. After the Northern Ute chiefs had signed the treaty, Irish sent it to Washington where it languished in Congress until 1869 when the Senate finally rejected it. Anticipating the ratification of the treaty, Irish began to move the Utes to the Uinta Basin during the winter of 1865–66. In Utah's Trail of Tears, the Northern Utes suffered unimaginable hardship and unnumbered deaths from exposure and starvation.

Sally Young Kanosh, pictured here in 1878, was the stepdaughter of Brigham Young and wife of Chief Kanosh.

Chief Kanosh (1821–1884) was the leader of the Pahvant Utes from the 1850s until his death.

Black Hawk, a Ute Leader, led his tribe against the settlers in the longest and most destructive conflict in Utah history.

In the meantime, a band of Sanpitch Utes under the leadership of Black Hawk (Autenquer), a subchief, had recognized the futility of such negotiations and began to raid Mormon settlements for horses and cattle. When they failed to get the rations promised in the Spanish Fork Treaty, warriors from San Pitch's and Tabby's bands began to leave the Uintah Reservation to join in what Utahns called the Black Hawk War. Moreover, in spite of the traditional animosity between the various tribes, Paiutes and Navajos joined with the Northern Utes to steal livestock from Mormon settle-